Section 3:

Freedom of Speech and Press

Section 4:

Freedom of Assembly and Petition

Lesson Goals

SECTION 1

Students will...

- identify liberties guaranteed by the Bill of Rights by analyzing photographs and political cartoons.
- understand that rights are not absolute by debating issues in which rights and interests must be balanced.
- describe how the Constitution protects the rights of individuals by creating a diagram.

SECTION 2

Students will...

- clarify the meaning of the Establishment Clause and its “wall of separation” by completing a diagram and chart concerning cases on freedom of religion.
- learn how the Supreme Court has interpreted the Establishment Clause and Free Exercise Clause by evaluating scenarios about freedom of religion conflicts.

Students will...

- identify the limits and protections of freedom of speech by charting restrictions on different forms of expression, analyzing prior restraint, summarizing court rulings on student speech, and interpreting political cartoons.
- identify the limits and protections of freedom of the press by researching media cases.

SECTION 4

Students will...

- distinguish the conflicting but essential nature of the right to assemble by participating in scenarios about freedom of assembly and petition conflicts.
- understand the restrictions on assembly and petition by identifying and applying time-place-manner regulations and content neutrality to assembly situations.

“All through the years we have had to fight for civil liberty, and we know that there are times when the light grows rather dim, and every time that happens democracy is in danger.

3. Show how federalism affects individual rights.
4. Describe how the 9th Amendment helps protect individual rights.

Have you ever heard of Walter Barnette? How about Toyosaburo Korematsu? Dollree Mapp? Clarence Earl Gideon? Walter Barnette was a Jehovah's Witness in West Virginia who told his children not to salute the American flag or to recite the Pledge of Allegiance in school. Toyosaburo Korematsu was an American citizen interned by the Federal Government during World War II. Dollree Mapp was jailed for keeping "lewd and lascivious books" in her boarding house in Ohio. Clarence Earl Gideon went to prison for breaking into a poolroom in Florida. You will encounter these names again as you read this chapter and the next one. Each of these people played an important part in building and protecting the rights of all Americans.

A Commitment to Freedom

A commitment to personal freedom is deeply rooted in America's colonial past. For centuries, the people of England waged a continuing struggle for individual rights, and the early colonists brought a dedication to that cause with them to America.

Their commitment to freedom took root here, and it flourished. The Revolutionary War was fought to preserve and expand those very rights: the rights of the individual against government. In proclaiming the independence of the new United States, the founders of this country declared:

PRIMARY SOURCE

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men. . . .

—Declaration of Independence

The Framers of the Constitution repeated the justification for the existence of government in the Preamble to the Constitution. That document, they said, was written to "secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity"

546 Civil Liberties: First Amendment Freedoms

Focus on the Basics

FACTS: • The first ten amendments to the Constitution are known as the Bill of Rights. • Individual rights are not absolute. • The 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause prevents the States from abridging rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. • The 9th Amendment declares that people may have rights in addition to those listed in the Constitution.

CONCEPTS: limited government, individual rights, federalism, due process of law

ENDURING UNDERSTANDINGS: • The guarantees in the Bill of Rights reflect the nation's commitment to personal freedom and to the principle of limited government. • The Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment ensures that State governments do not limit or take away rights given to citizens by the National Government.

The Constitution, as it was written in Philadelphia, contained a number of important guarantees. The most notable of these can be found in Article I, Sections 9 and 10, and in Article III. Unlike many of the first State constitutions, however, the new National Constitution did not include a general listing of the rights of the people.

That omission raised an outcry. The objections were so strong that several States ratified the Constitution only with the understanding that a listing of rights would soon be added. The first session of the new Congress proposed a series of amendments. Ten of them, known as the Bill of Rights, were ratified by the States and became a part of the Constitution on December 15, 1791. Later amendments, especially the 13th and the 14th, have added to the Constitution's guarantees of personal freedom.

The Constitution guarantees both rights and liberties to the American people. The distinction between civil rights and civil liberties is murky at best. Legal scholars often disagree on the matter, and the two terms often are used interchangeably.

Think of the distinction this way: In general, civil liberties are protections against government. They are guarantees of the safety of persons, opinions, and property from arbitrary acts of government. Thus, freedom of religion, freedom of speech and press, and the guarantees of fair trial are prime examples of civil liberties.

In contrast, civil rights are often associated with positive acts of government that seek to make constitutional guarantees a reality for all people. Viewed from this perspective, laws against discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religious belief, or national origin set out in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 are leading examples of civil rights.

Limited Government

Remember, government in the United States is limited. The Constitution is filled with examples of this fact. Chief among them are its many guarantees of personal freedom. Each of those guarantees is either an outright prohibition or a restriction on the power of government to do something.

All governments have and use authority over individuals. The all-important difference between a democratic government and a dictatorial one lies in the extent of that authority. In a dictatorial regime, the government's powers are practically unlimited. The government regularly suppresses dissent, often harshly. In the United States, however, governmental authority is strictly limited. As Justice Robert H. Jackson once put the point:

PRIMARY SOURCE

If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or any other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein.

—West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 1943

Rights Are Relative, Not Absolute The Constitution guarantees many rights to everyone in the United States. Still, no one has the right to do anything he or she pleases. Rather, all persons have the right to do as they please as long as they do not infringe on the rights of others. That is, each person's rights are relative to the rights of every other person.

To illustrate the point: Everyone in the United States has a right of free speech, but no one enjoys absolute freedom of speech. A person can be punished for

INTRODUCE THE TOPIC

Write these terms on the board and ask students to define them in their notebooks: civil liberties (guarantees of the safety of persons, opinions, and property from the arbitrary acts of government); Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments to the Constitution); unalienable rights (rights that cannot be taken away; life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness). Work with the class to agree on definitions and write them on the board. Next, have students name the 1st Amendment rights and freedoms. (freedom of religion, speech, and press; the right to assemble and to petition the government for redress of grievances)

L3 Differentiate Ask students why they think this section is titled “The Unalienable Rights.” (It covers the most basic of rights—the 1st Amendment freedoms.) Can students think of additional rights they consider unalienable?

(In dictatorships, protests against the government are usually put down forcibly.)

L3 L4 Differentiate Ask students to identify demonstrations that have had an impact on the United States or other countries. using obscene language, or for using words in a way that causes someone to commit a crime—to riot or to desert from the military, for example. The Supreme Court dealt with this point in a recent case, Morse v. Frederick, 2007. A 5–4 majority held that school officials in Alaska acted properly when they disciplined a student for displaying a banner that could be read as promoting drug use.

In this oft-quoted line, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes put the relative nature of each person's rights in this way:

PRIMARY SOURCE

The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic.

—Schenck v. United States, 1919

adj strict, rigid, narrow

When Rights Conflict On occasion, different guarantees of rights come into conflict with one another. For example, cases involving freedom of the press versus the right to a fair trial are not at all uncommon.

In one famous case, Dr. Samuel Sheppard of Cleveland, Ohio, had been convicted of murdering his wife. His lengthy trial was widely covered in the national media. On appeal, Sheppard claimed that the highly sensational coverage had denied him a fair trial. The Supreme Court agreed. In Sheppard v. Maxwell, 1966, the Court rejected the free press argument, overturned Sheppard's conviction, and ordered a new trial.

To Whom Are Rights Guaranteed? Most constitutional rights are extended to all persons. The Supreme Court has often held that “persons” includes aliens, people who are not citizens of the country in which they live. Not all rights are given to aliens, however. The right to travel freely throughout the country is guaranteed to all citizens, for example, but the travel of aliens can be restricted.¹

¹ See the two Privileges and Immunities clauses, in Article IV, Section 2, and the 14th Amendment. The guarantee does not extend to citizens under some form of legal restraint—for example, in jail or out on bail awaiting trial.

After the bombing of Pearl Harbor by Japan, all persons of Japanese descent living on the Pacific Coast were evacuated—forcibly moved—inland. Many suffered economic and other hardships. In 1944, the Supreme Court reluctantly upheld the forced evacuation as a reasonable wartime emergency measure.² Still, the relocation was strongly criticized over the years. In 1988, the Federal Government admitted that the wartime relocation had been both unnecessary and unjust. Congress voted to pay $20,000 to each living internee. It also declared, “the Congress apologizes on behalf of the nation.”

The current war on terrorism has created a political climate similar to that of the early days of World War II. Did the mistreatment of Japanese Americans then provide a lesson for today? Will the rights of Muslims and others of Middle Eastern descent be respected by government as it fights terrorism here and abroad?

Federalism and Individual Rights

Federalism is a complicated governmental arrangement. It produces any number of problems—including a very complex pattern of guarantees of individual rights in the United States.

The Bill of Rights Remember, the first ten amendments were originally intended as restrictions on the new National Government, not on the already existing States. And that remains the fact of the matter today.³

To illustrate this important point: The 5th Amendment says that no person can be charged with “a capital, or otherwise infamous crime” except by a grand jury. As a part of the Bill of Rights, this provision applies ² Korematsu v. United States, 1944. However, on the same day the Court held, in Ex parte Endo, that once the loyalty of any citizen internee had been established, no restriction could be placed on that person's freedom to travel that was not legally imposed on all other citizens.

³ The Supreme Court first held that the provisions of the Bill of Rights restrict only the National Government in Baron v. Baltimore, 1833. This was the first case in which the point was raised. The Supreme Court has followed that holding (precedent) ever since.

Background

DUE PROCESS CLAUSE Congress rejected much of the original draft of the Bill of Rights, which contained restrictions on both National and State governments. In the late 1700s, many Americans trusted their State governments far more than the National Government. For many decades, however, some State governments ignored the First Amendment right to freedom of religion and continued to have State-supported churches. Decades after the Civil War ended, many southern States ignored the 14th Amendment, which was intended to protect the rights of former slaves. According to political science professor Richard Cortner, through the incorporation process the Court turned the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment into a “second bill of rights” more applicable “to the liberty of the average American than the one . . . ratified by the states in 1791.”

► Interpreting Charts This chart shows which rights the Supreme Court has “nationalized” by incorporating them into the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment. Why do you think that some, but not all, rights are incorporated under the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause?

FROM THE CONSTITUTION

No State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. . . .

—14th Amendment, Section 1

The Supreme Court has often said that the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause means that no State can deny to any person any right that is “basic or essential to the American concept of ordered liberty.”

But what specific rights are “basic or essential”? The Supreme Court has answered this question in a long series of cases in which it has held that most (but not all) of the protections in the Bill of Rights are also covered by the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause, and so apply against the States. In deciding those cases, the Court has engaged in what has come to be called the process of incorporation. It has incorporated—merged, only to the National Government. The States may use the grand jury to bring accusations of serious crime—or, if they prefer, they can use some other process to do so. The grand jury is a part of the criminal justice system in all but two States and the District of Columbia, however. For additional information, see the coverage of the grand jury in the next chapter and also in Chapter 24.

The Modifying Effect of the 14th Amendment Again, the provisions of the Bill of Rights apply against the National Government, not against the States. This does not mean, however, that the States can deny basic rights to the people.

In part, the States cannot do so because each of their own constitutions contains a bill of rights. In addition, they cannot deny these basic rights because of the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause. It says:

Tell students to go to the Audio Tour for a listing of rights incorporated in the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause.

Constitutional Principles

JUDICIAL REVIEW In Gitlow v. New York, 1925, the Supreme Court established that the Due Process Clause prevented States from impairing personal freedoms. However, the decision upheld Gitlow's conviction. Justice Holmes, in dissent, went one step further in arguing that the conviction be overturned. His dissent addressed the New York attorneys' claim that Gitlow's actions were an incitement. “It is said that this manifesto was more than a theory, that it was an incitement. Every idea is an incitement. . . . The only difference between the expression of an opinion and incitement in the narrower sense is the speaker's enthusiasm for the result.”

combined—most of the guarantees in the Bill of Rights into the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause.

The Court began that historic incorporation in Gitlow v. New York, 1925. The landmark case involved Benjamin Gitlow, a Communist, who had been convicted of criminal anarchy in the State courts. He had made several speeches and published a pamphlet calling for the violent overthrow of government in this country.

On appeal, the Court upheld Gitlow's conviction and the State law under which he had been tried. In deciding the case, however, the Court made this crucial point: Freedom of speech and press, which the 1st Amendment says cannot be denied by the National Government, are also "among the fundamental personal rights and liberties protected by the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment from impairment by the States."

Soon after Gitlow, the Court held each of the 1st Amendment's guarantees to be covered by the 14th Amendment. It struck down State laws involving speech (Fiske v. Kansas, 1927; Stromberg v. California, 1931), the press (Near v. Minnesota, 1931), assembly and petition (De Jonge v. Oregon, 1937), and religion (Cantwell v. Connecticut, 1940). In each of those cases, the Court declared a State law unconstitutional as a violation of the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause.

In the 1960s, the Court extended the scope of the 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause even further. The key guarantees are listed in the chart on the previous page. You will look at each of the guarantees involved—the 1st Amendment rights in this chapter and the others in Chapter 20.

The 9th Amendment

Nowhere in the Constitution will you find a complete catalog of all of the rights held by the American people. The little-noted 9th Amendment explicitly declares that rights exist beyond those listed in the Constitution:

FROM THE CONSTITUTION

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

—9th Amendment

Over the years, the Supreme Court has found a number of other rights "retained by the people." They include, most notably, the guarantee that an accused person will not be tried on the basis of evidence unlawfully gained, and the right of a woman to choose to have an abortion without undue interference by government.

3. Summarize the Supreme Court rulings on religion and education as well as other Establishment Clause cases.
4. Explain how the Supreme Court has interpreted and limited the Free Exercise Clause.

Image Above: Americans are free to practice religion as they please.

In the early 1830s, a Frenchman, Alexis de Tocqueville, came to America to observe life in the young country. He later wrote in his classic, Democracy in America, that he had searched for the greatness of America in many places: in its large harbors and deep rivers, in its fertile fields and boundless forests, in its rich mines and vast world commerce, in its public schools and institutions of higher learning, and in its democratic legislature and matchless Constitution. Yet it was not until he went into the churches that Tocqueville said he came to understand the genius and the power of this country.

Religious Liberty

The 1st Amendment sets out two guarantees of religious freedom. It prohibits (1) “an establishment of religion” (in the Establishment Clause), and (2) any arbitrary interference by government with “the free exercise thereof” (in the Free Exercise Clause). And, recall, both protections are extended against the States by the Due Process Clause in the 14th Amendment.⁴

These constitutional guarantees were born out of decades of colonial opposition to established churches—to official government-sponsored churches in the colonies. The Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, adopted in 1786, was the immediate basis for the 1st Amendment. Drafted by Thomas Jefferson, that law provided for absolute religious freedom in Virginia. It declared that that State could not require that any person profess any set of religious beliefs nor support any religious institution.

Separation of Church and State

The Establishment Clause sets up, in Thomas Jefferson’s words, “a wall of separation between church and state.” That wall is not infinitely high, however, and it is not impenetrable. Church and government are constitutionally separated in this country, but they are neither enemies nor even strangers to one another.

⁴ Also, Article VI, Section 3 provides that “no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.” In Torcaso v. Watkins, 1961, the Supreme Court held that the 14th Amendment puts the same restriction on the States.

SKILLS DEVELOPMENTDECISION MAKING

Before students begin analyzing the various scenarios presented in this lesson, you may want to review tips on decision making in the Skills Handbook, p. S18.

Focus on the Basics

FACTS: • The 1st Amendment’s Establishment Clause prohibits government from establishing or aiding religion. • Most Establishment Clause cases involve religion and education. • The 1st Amendment’s Free Exercise Clause guarantees individuals the right to believe as they choose in matters of religion. • The 14th Amendment’s Due Process Clause extends 1st Amendment protections against the States.

CONCEPTS: individual rights and responsibilities, limited government, judicial review

ENDURING UNDERSTANDINGS: • The Establishment Clause sets up “a wall of separation between church and state.” • The Free Exercise Clause protects religious beliefs but does not protect religious actions that violate laws or threaten safety.

BELLRINGER

Write on the board: In what ways is freedom of religion limited in public schools? Answer in your notebook.

L2 Differentiate Provide prompts, such as focus on prayer, the Bible, group meetings, religious artifacts, and religious clothing.

REVIEW BELLRINGER ANSWERS

Ask students to share their answers to the Bellringer question. Possible responses:

- School-sponsored prayer or “moments of silence” are prohibited.
- Observances of religious holidays are prohibited.
- Religious groups cannot use public school facilities during school hours.
- Bible study is prohibited in classrooms.
- The Ten Commandments and religious icons cannot be posted in classrooms.

L2 Differentiate Have students define the term icons (visual representations of gods, saints, and other religious entities).

L3 Differentiate Ask: Why do you think government prohibits these forms of religious expression in public schools? (Guide students to conclude that limiting government support for and opposition to all religions protects minority religions and free expression for all people.)

L2 L3 Differentiate Demonstrate the sensitive nature of personal belief. First, ask students to raise their hands if they have brown eyes; do the same with blue-eyed and green-eyed students. Explain to students in the minority that they will have to purchase and wear [brown] contact lenses to “fit in.” Now loosely apply this reasoning to religion. Ask students how comfortable they would be if they were asked which religion, if any, they and their family follow. Point out that anyone who follows a minority religion would be “different.” In many countries, they would be harassed. In the United States, however, their beliefs are protected.

L3 Differentiate Ask: What aspects of religion do you think are allowed in public schools? (Examples: Individuals can pray when and as they choose in any place. The Bible can be studied as a literary or historical piece. Religious groups may use public school facilities after school.)

According to the Supreme Court, how does state-sponsored support of prayer in schools violate the 1st Amendment?

n. a religious group

Government has done much to encourage churches and religion in the United States. Nearly all property of and contributions to religious sects are free from federal, State, and local taxation. Chaplains serve with each branch of the armed forces. Most public officials take an oath of office in the name of God. Sessions of Congress, most State legislatures, and many city councils open with prayer. The nation’s anthem and its coins and currency make reference to God.

The limits imposed by the Establishment Clause remain a matter of continuing and often heated controversy. The Supreme Court did not hear its first Establishment Clause case until 1947. A few earlier cases did involve government and religion, but none of them involved a direct consideration of the “wall of separation.”

The most important of those earlier cases was Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 1925. There, the Court held an Oregon compulsory school attendance law unconstitutional. That law required parents to send their children to public schools. It was purposely intended to eliminate private and especially parochial (church-related) schools.

In striking down the law, the Court did not address the Establishment Clause question. Instead, it found the law to be an unreasonable interference with the liberty of parents to direct the upbringing of their children—and so in conflict with the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment.

Religion and Education

The Court’s first direct ruling on the Establishment Clause came in Everson v. Board of Education, a 1947 case often called the New Jersey School Bus Case. The Court upheld a State law that provided for the public, tax-supported busing of students attending any school in the State, including parochial ones.

Critics had attacked the law as a support of religion. They maintained that it relieved parochial schools of the need to pay for busing and so freed their money for other, including religious, purposes. The Court disagreed; it found the law to be a safety measure intended to benefit children, no matter what schools they might attend. Since that decision, the largest number of the Court’s Establishment Clause cases have involved, in one way or another, religion and education.

Released Time “Released time” programs allow public schools to release students during school hours to attend religious classes. In McCollum v. Board of Education, 1948, the Court struck down the released time program then in place in Champaign, Illinois, because the program used public facilities for religious purposes.

Yet in Zorach v. Clauson, 1952, the Court upheld New York City’s released time program. It did so because that program required religious classes to be held in private places off school grounds.

Prayers and the Bible The Court has now decided seven major cases involving prayer and the reading of the Bible in public schools. In Engel v. Vitale, 1962, the Court outlawed the use, even on a voluntary basis, of a prayer written by the New York State Board of Regents. The prayer read: “Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers, and our country.”

In striking down the prayer, the Supreme Court held that:

PRIMARY SOURCE
[T]he constitutional prohibition against laws respecting an establishment of religion must at least mean that, in this country, it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as part of a religious program carried on by government.

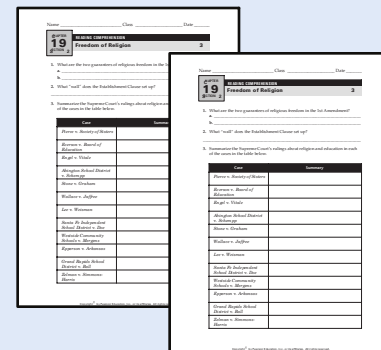

—Justice Hugo L. Black

The High Court extended that holding in two 1963 cases. In Abington School District v. Schempp, it struck down a Pennsylvania law requiring that each school day begin with readings from the Bible and a recitation of the Lord’s Prayer. In Murray v. Curlett, the Court erased a similar rule in Baltimore. In both cases, the Court found violations of

1st Amendment

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

FROM THE CONSTITUTION

▲ Public schools cannot sponsor prayer at school-related events.

Ruling on Religion The Court has held that public schools cannot sponsor religious exercises. It has not ruled, however, that individuals cannot pray when and as they choose in schools or in any other place. Nor has it held that students cannot study the Bible in a literary or historical context in school. The Court's rulings have nevertheless been widely criticized. Many critics have proposed that the Constitution be amended to allow voluntary group prayer in public schools. Despite the Court's decisions, both organized prayer and Bible readings are found in many public school classrooms today.

Constitutional Principles How does the separation of church and state reflect the principle of limited government?

“the command of the 1st Amendment that the government maintain strict neutrality, neither aiding nor opposing religion.”

Since then, the Supreme Court has found the following to be unconstitutional:

- a Kentucky law that ordered the posting of the Ten Commandments in all public school classrooms, Stone v. Graham, 1980;
- Alabama's “moment of silence” law, Wallace v. Jaffree, 1985, which provided for a one-minute period for “meditation or voluntary prayer” at the start of each school day;
- the offering of prayer as part of a public school graduation ceremony, in a Rhode Island case, Lee v. Weisman, 1992;
- a Texas school district's policy that permitted student-led prayer at high school football games, Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 2000.

Student Religious Groups The Equal Access Act of 1984 declares that any public high school that receives federal funds (nearly all do) must allow student religious groups to meet in the school on the same terms that it sets for other student organizations. The Supreme Court found that the law does not violate the Establishment Clause in a Nebraska case, Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 1990. There, several students had tried to form a Christian club at the high school. The students had to fight the school board in the federal courts in order to win their point.

The High Court has since gone much further than it did in Mergens—in a case from New York, Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 2001. There, a school board had refused to allow a group of grade-school students to meet after school to sing, pray, memorize scriptures, and hear Bible lessons. The school board based its action on the Establishment Clause. The Court, however, held that the board had violated Good News Club members' 1st and 14th amendment rights to free speech.

Background

BUILDING THE “WALL” In 1787, the Constitution's only mention of religion was a statement that there could be no religious requirements for holding federal office. Thomas Jefferson, unlike many leaders of his day, was committed to a “wall of separation between church and state.” He resisted declaring a national day of prayer and thanksgiving. With this unpopular action, he broke a tradition begun by George Washington. Despite the 1st Amendment ban on the establishment of religion, some States continued to ignore the Bill of Rights on this issue. In the early 1800s, some States taxed their citizens to support their State's Christian churches. Several State constitutions prohibited non-Christians from holding public office or refused to allow them to vote. The “wall of separation” grew more quickly after the incorporation process of the 14th Amendment began in the twentieth century.

CLARIFY “ESTABLISHMENT” AND “FREE EXERCISE”

Have a volunteer read aloud the 1st Amendment in the textbook feature. Ask: Which part of the 1st Amendment addresses freedom of religion? Be sure students understand that the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom has two parts: the Establishment Clause (creates a “wall of separation between church and state” by prohibiting government from passing any law that establishes a State or national religion or favors one religion over another) and the Free Exercise Clause (guarantees all people the right to believe whatever they choose in matters of religion).

L2 ELL Differentiate Explain that the term church refers to all religions and state refers to local, State, and National Government.

L2 Differentiate Point out that another way to think of the Establishment Clause is as an “anti-Establishment Clause”—the government cannot establish or favor a religion.

DRAW A “WALL OF SEPARATION”

The “height” of the wall of separation—the limits imposed by the Establishment Clause—varies. Have students draw, in pencil, a five-paneled wall and the labels “church” in the foreground and “state” in the background. On the board, list these Establishment Clause cases (but not the height of the panels):

- Engel v. Vitale, 1962 (high panel)
- Wallace v. Jaffree, 1985 (high panel)
- Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan, 1980 (medium panel)
- County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 1989 (high panel)
- March v. Chambers, 1983 (low panel)

Have students label their panels with the cases and their rulings. Students should read about each case, decide whether the Court placed a high or low wall of separation, adjust the panel height accordingly, and explain their reasoning.

L2 Differentiate Instead of actual cases, write the following issues on the board, and have students apply them to their walls. These issues correspond to the cases above.

- School-sponsored prayer (high panel)
- State-sponsored “moment of silence” (high panel)
- State support for standardized testing in parochial schools (medium panel)
- Seasonal displays of a single religious doctrine at government buildings (high panel)
- Group prayer in State legislatures (low panel)

A parent sued the school board, claiming that the prayer violated his child's 1st Amendment rights. The school board argued that the prayer was nondenominational and did not attempt to “establish or endorse” a religion. Checkpoint to determine whether or not a State law or State aid to parochial schools amounts to an establishment of religion

Evolution In Epperson v. Arkansas, 1968, the Supreme Court struck down a State law forbidding the teaching of the scientific theory of evolution. The Supreme Court held that the Constitution forbids alike the preference of a religious doctrine or the prohibition of theory which is deemed antagonistic to a particular dogma. . . . ‘The State has no legitimate interest in protecting any or all religions from views distasteful to them.’

—Justice Abe Fortas

The Court found a similar law to be unconstitutional in 1987. In Edwards v. Aguillard, it voided a 1981 Louisiana law that provided that whenever teachers taught the theory of evolution, they also had to offer instruction in “creation science.”

Aid to Parochial Schools Most recent Establishment Clause cases have centered on this highly controversial question: What forms of State aid to parochial schools are constitutional? Several States give help to private schools, including schools run by church organizations, for transportation, textbooks, standardized testing, and much else.

Those who support this aid argue that parochial schools enroll many students who would otherwise have to be educated at public expense. They also point out that parents have a legal right to send their children to those schools (Pierce v. Society of Sisters).

To give that right real meaning, they say, the State must give some aid to parochial schools in order to relieve parents of some of the double burden they carry because they must pay taxes to support the public schools their children do not attend. Advocates also insist that schools run by religious organizations pose no real church-state problems because they devote most of their time to secular subjects rather than to sectarian ones.

Several States give aid to parochial schools for such things as transportation.

Debate

Use the statement below to initiate a debate in your class. Use the debate rules on page T25 to structure the class.

Allowing a moment of silent prayer in the public school classroom does/does not violate the Establishment Clause.

Opponents of aid to parochial schools argue that parents who send their children to parochial schools should accept the financial consequences of that choice. Many of these critics also insist that it is impossible to draw clear lines between secular and sectarian courses in parochial schools. They say that religious beliefs are bound to have an effect on the teaching of nonreligious subjects.

The Lemon Test The Court applies a three-pronged standard, the Lemon test, to decide whether a State law amounts to an “establishment” of religion. That standard states: (1) a law must have a secular, not religious, purpose; (2) it must neither advance nor inhibit religion; and (3) it must not foster an “excessive entanglement” of government and religion.

The test stems from Lemon v. Kurtzman, 1971. There, the Supreme Court held that the Establishment Clause is designed to prevent three main evils: “sponsorship, financial support, and active involvement of the sovereign in religious activity.” It struck down a Pennsylvania law that provided for reimbursements (money payments) to private schools to cover their costs for teachers’ salaries, textbooks, and other teaching materials in nonreligious courses.

The Court held that the State’s program was of direct benefit to parochial schools, and so to the churches sponsoring them. It also found that the Pennsylvania program required such close State supervision that it produced an excessive entanglement of government with religion.

More often than not, the Court has ruled unconstitutional those laws that provide some form of public aid to church-related schools. Thus, it ruled in an Ohio case that public funds can not be used to pay for such things as field trips for parochial school students, Wolman v. Walter, 1977. Nor can tax monies be used to pay any part of the salaries of parochial school teachers, even those who teach only secular courses, Grand Rapids School District v. Ball, 1985. In this Michigan case, the Supreme Court noted that while the contents of, say, a textbook used in a course might be checked easily, the way a teacher handles that course cannot. And the Court invalidated a New York law that created a small school district to benefit handicapped school children in a tight-knit community of Hasidic Jews, Board of Education of Kiryas Joel v. Grumet, 1994.

Some State laws have passed the Lemon test, however. The Court has held that New York can pay church-related schools what it costs them to administer the State's standardized tests, Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan, 1980. In a 1993 case from Arizona, Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, it said that the use of public money to provide an interpreter for a deaf student in a Catholic high school does not violate the Establishment Clause. The Constitution, said the Court, does not place an absolute barrier to the placing of a public employee in a religious school.

In 1973, the Court struck down a New York law that reimbursed parents for the tuition they paid to religious schools, Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist. But in Mueller v. Allen, 1983, it upheld a Minnesota tax law that really accomplishes the same end.

The Minnesota law gives parents a State income tax deduction for the costs of tuition, textbooks, and transportation. Most public school parents pay little or nothing for those items, so the law is of particular benefit to parents with children in private, mostly parochial, schools. The Court found that the law meets the Lemon test, and it relied on this point: The tax deduction is available to all parents with children in school.

The High Court went much further in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris in 2002. There, it upheld Ohio's experimental "school choice" plan. Under that plan, parents in Cleveland can receive vouchers (grants for tuition payments) from the State and use them to send their children to private schools. Nearly all families who take the vouchers send their children to parochial schools. The Court found, 5–4, that the Ohio program is not intended to promote religion but, rather, to help children from low-income families.

Other Establishment Cases

Most church-state controversies have involved public education. Some Establishment Clause cases have arisen in other policy areas, however.

Seasonal Displays Many public organizations sponsor celebrations of the holiday season with street decorations, programs in public schools, and the like. Can these publicly sponsored observances properly include expressions of religious belief?

In Lynch v. Donnelly, 1984, the Court held that the city of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, could include the Christian nativity scene in its holiday display, which also featured non-religious objects such as Santa's sleigh and reindeer. That ruling, however, left open this question: What about a public display made up only of a religious symbol?

The Court faced that question in 1989. In County of Allegheny v. ACLU, it held that the

REVEAL THE CORE WORKSHEET SCENARIO RULINGS

Ask: How do you think the Supreme Court or lower courts might rule in these cases? Explain your reasoning. As you share the actual rulings, ask for a show of hands of those who agree or disagree with the ruling, and why.

- Scenario A is based on Engel v. Vitale, 1962. The Supreme Court ruled that the school board could not sponsor prayers and similar religious activities because they violated the Establishment Clause of the 1st Amendment.
- Scenario B is based on Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commission of Florida, 1987. The Court ruled in favor of the worker: "To condition the availability of benefits upon this appellant's unwillingness to violate a cardinal principle of her religious faith effectively penalizes the free exercise of her constitutional liberties."
- Scenario C is based on Doe v. Porter, 2004, argued in the 6th District Court of Appeals. The judge ruled that the school board violated the Establishment Clause by allowing the college students to conduct Bible classes during school time, and the program failed the Lemon test.
- Scenario D is based on the Eastern District of Oklahoma case Hearn, et al. v. Muskogee Public School District, 2004. The U.S. government intervened on behalf of the student, identifying the issue as a civil rights issue of equal protection. The school district agreed to revise its dress code to allow exceptions for religious reasons.

Background

HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY At the beginning of the Revolution in 1775, there were official, State-supported churches in at least eight former colonies. Because of growing opposition, most established churches did not survive the revolutionary period. Jefferson, with Patrick Henry and George Mason, led the effort to disestablish the Church of England in Virginia (1779). Jefferson also wrote the Virginia Statute of Religious Liberty (1786), which provided for absolute religious freedom and equality and was a precursor of the 1st Amendment. It declared that the State could not require that any person profess any set of religious beliefs nor could it support any religious institution. An insistence upon religious freedom was also written into the Northwest Ordinance (1787). Article VI of the Constitution, written that same year, prohibited any religious test as a qualification for public office in the United States.

Establishment Clause Cases

How Did the Court Rule?

Seasonal Displays

A Christmas tree sparkles in front of the California State Capitol. The Court has ruled that “government may celebrate Christmas in some manner and form, but not in a way that endorses Christian doctrine.”

Chaplains

A chaplain offers the opening prayer in both houses of Congress and most State legislatures (shown here). The Court has ruled that this practice, unlike organized prayers in public schools, is constitutionally permissible.

✓ Checkpoint
How do each of the situations described here and in the photos above exemplify the Establishment Clause?

county’s seasonal display “endorsed Christian doctrine,” and so violated the 1st and 14th amendments. The county courthouse had a large display celebrating the birth of Jesus and a banner proclaiming “Glory to God in the Highest.”

At the same time, the Court upheld another holiday display in Pittsburgh v. ACLU. The city’s display consisted of a Christmas tree, an 18-foot menorah, and a sign declaring the city’s dedication to freedom.

Chaplains Daily sessions of both houses of Congress and most of the State legislatures begin with prayer. In Congress, and in many States, chaplains paid with public funds offer the opening prayer.

The Supreme Court has ruled that this practice, unlike prayers in the public schools, is constitutionally permissible. The ruling was made in a case involving Nebraska’s one-house legislature, Marsh v. Chambers, 1983.

The Court rested its distinction between school prayers and legislative prayers on two points. First, prayers have been offered in the nation’s legislative bodies “from colonial times through the founding of the Republic and ever since.” Second, legislators, unlike schoolchildren, are not “susceptible to ‘religious indoctrination,’ or peer pressure.”

The Ten Commandments Public displays of the Ten Commandments have ignited controversy in several places in recent years. The High Court decided its first case on the matter, Stone v. Graham, in 1980. It ruled on two other similar cases in 2005.

In Van Orden v. Perry, the Court held that the Ten Commandments monument located on the grounds of the Texas State Capitol in Austin does not violate the 1st and 14th amendments. The Court found that the monument (1) was erected in 1961 as part of a private group’s campaign against juvenile delinquency, (2) is set among 37 other historical and cultural markers, and (3) had gone unchallenged for some 40 years. In short, the Court found the monument’s overall message to be secular rather than religious and therefore acceptable.

In McCreary County v. ACLU of Kentucky, a differently divided 5–4 majority ruled that the display of the Ten Commandments in Kentucky county courthouses was unacceptable. They were, said the Court, an impermissible endorsement of religion by government.

Supreme Court Notes

LIMITS ON FREE EXERCISE In Oregon v. Smith, 1990, the Court upheld Oregon’s denial of unemployment benefits to a man who had been fired by a private drug counseling group because he had smoked peyote in violation of the State’s drug laws—even though the man had done so as part of a ceremony conducted by his Native American Church. However, Congress reacted to that decision by passing the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993. In effect, that law permits the use of peyote, and other controlled substances, when that use occurs as part of a legitimate religious ceremony. More recently, the High Court has limited free exercise at the college level. It said that a State that provides financial aid to students who attend its public colleges and universities does not have to make that help available to students who are studying to become ministers (Locke v. Davey, 2004).

Checkpoint Seasonal displays: Christmas trees and other secular decorations do not violate the Establishment Clause. Chaplains: Legislative sessions opening with prayer are constitutional, because legislators are not “susceptible to religious indoctrination or peer pressure.” The Ten Commandments: Rulings vary on whether the original display was set among other historical and cultural markers.

The Ten Commandments

A tablet of the Ten Commandments is removed from a public building. The Court has ruled differently depending on whether the display is designed to promote religion.

Framed copies of the Commandments were first posted in county courthouses in 1999. Nonreligious documents, including the Bill of Rights, were added to the displays some years later, but only after the original displays' content had been challenged. The Supreme Court found that the original displays had a clear religious purpose. The later additions were merely "a sham," an attempt to mask that unconstitutional religious purpose.

The Free Exercise Clause

The second part of the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom is set out in the 1st Amendment's Free Exercise Clause, which guarantees to each person the right to believe whatever he or she chooses to believe in matters of religion. No law and no other action by any government can violate that absolute constitutional right. It is protected by both the 1st and the 14th amendments.

No person has an absolute right to act as he or she chooses, however. The Free Exercise Clause does not give anyone the right to violate criminal laws, offend public morals, or threaten community safety.

The Supreme Court laid down the basic shape of the Free Exercise Clause in the first case it heard on the issue, Reynolds v. United States, 1879. Reynolds, a Mormon, had two wives. That practice, polygamy, was allowed by his church but prohibited by federal law in any territory.

Reynolds was convicted under the law. On appeal, he argued that the law violated his right to the free exercise of his religious beliefs. The Supreme Court disagreed. It held that the 1st Amendment does not forbid Congress the power to punish those actions that are "violations of social duties or subversive of good order."

Limits on Free Exercise Over the years, the Court has approved many regulations of human conduct in the face of free exercise challenges. For example, it has upheld laws that require the vaccination of schoolchildren, Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 1905; laws that forbid the use of poisonous snakes in religious rites, Bunn v. North Carolina, 1949; and laws that require certain businesses to be closed on Sundays ("blue laws"), McGowan v. Maryland, 1961.

A State can require religious groups to have a permit to hold a parade on public streets, Cox v. New Hampshire, 1941; and organizations that enlist children to sell religious literature must obey child labor laws, Prince v. Massachusetts, 1944. The Federal Government can draft those who have religious objections to military service, Welsh v. United States, 1970.

The Court has also held that the Air Force can deny an Orthodox Jew the right to wear his yarmulke (skull cap) while on active duty, Goldman v. Weinberger, 1986. The U.S. Forest Service can allow private companies to build roads and cut timber in national forests that Native Americans have traditionally used for religious purposes, Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 1988.

Free Exercise Upheld Over time, however, the Court has found many actions by governments to be incompatible with the free exercise guarantee. The Court did so for the first time in one of the landmark Due Process cases cited earlier in this chapter,

REVISITING THE ESSENTIAL QUESTION

Write the chapter's Essential Question on the board: How can the judiciary balance individual rights with the common good? Ask students to write a paragraph applying this question to religious rights. (To protect people's right to practice their religion, the judiciary must uphold laws that ensure each individual is free to follow his or her own religious beliefs or to have no religious beliefs at all. To protect the common good, the judiciary must uphold laws that ensure that individuals practice their religions in ways that do not violate the rights of others in the community.)

Then have students work in pairs to write a brief that applies the three-part Lemon test to one of the cases discussed in the text. Tell students to use the Internet and other resources to learn more about the case they have chosen. Explain that student papers should include these parts of a typical brief for appealing a case to a higher court:

1. Statement of Facts: a short summary of the facts in the case;
2. Statement of Issues: the main issues or questions in the case;
3. Arguments: a list of reasons why the actions in this case do or do not pass the Lemon test, and a list of three related cases that provide precedents for arguments;
4. Conclusion: one or two sentences that ask the Court to affirm or overturn a lower court ruling or to issue a ruling prohibiting an existing program from continuing.

Understanding the Establishment Clause and the "wall of separation" (Questions 1, 2, 3, 5)	Have students write ten Establishment Clause cases on ten index cards. On another ten cards, have them write what these cases uphold or prohibit. Students should turn the cards facedown and mix them up in four rows of five cards each. Then have them play the Memory game, matching the cases with their rulings.
Understanding the Free Exercise Clause (Questions 1, 4, 6)	Have groups of five students write a news-cast summarizing five Free Exercise Clause cases. Then, in character as reporters or anchors, students should answer the questions Who? What? When? and Where? for each case in a 2- to 3-minute news story. As a conclusion, students should explain why these cases are considered Free Exercise cases.

- The 1st Amendment prohibits government from establishing or aiding religion, and guarantees to each person the free exercise of religion.
- (a) a statement in the 1st Amendment forbidding Congress from making any law that establishes a religion (b) It protects religion from interference by government.
- (a) The Lemon test evaluates laws that provide aid to parochial schools. (b) Lemon v. Kurtzman, 1971

- that each person has the right to believe whatever he or she wants to in matters of religion without interference from government
- Possible answer: The exact nature of separation cannot be pinned down, which leads to reinterpretation. In addition, religion is a sensitive topic for many Americans.
- Students should recognize that in these two cases, the Supreme Court struck down laws requiring prayer in schools. Students should provide reasons for their opinions.

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 1940. There, the Court struck down a law requiring a person to obtain a license before soliciting money for a religious cause. The Court reaffirmed that holding in an Ohio case, Watchtower Bible and Tract Society v. Village of Stratton, 2002.

The Supreme Court has decided a number of other cases in a similar way. Thus, Amish children cannot be forced to attend school beyond the 8th grade, because that sect's centuries-old "self-sufficient agrarian lifestyle is essential to their religious faith and is threatened by the exposure of their children to modern educational influences," Wisconsin v. Yoder, 1972. On the other hand, the Amish, who provide support for their own people, must pay Social Security taxes, as all other employers do, United States v. Lee, 1982.

The Court has often held that "only those beliefs rooted in religion are protected by the Free Exercise Clause," Sherbert v. Verner, 1963. So what beliefs are "rooted in religion"? Clearly, religions that seem strange to most Americans are as entitled to constitutional protection as are the more traditional ones. For example, in Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, 1993, the High Court struck down a Florida city's ordinance that outlawed animal sacrifices as part of any church services.

The Jehovah's Witnesses have carried several important religious freedom cases to the High Court. Perhaps the stormiest controversy resulting from these cases arose out of the Witnesses' refusal to salute the flag because they see such conduct as a violation of the Bible's commandment against idolatry. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 1940, the Court upheld a Pennsylvania school board regulation requiring students to salute the flag each morning. Walter Gobitis instructed his children not to do so, and the school expelled them. He went to court, basing his case on the constitutional guarantee.

Gobitis finally lost in the Supreme Court, which declared that the board's rule was not an infringement of religious liberty. Rather, it found the rule a lawful attempt to promote patriotism and national unity.

Three years later, in the midst of World War II, the Court reversed that decision. In West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 1943, it held a compulsory flag-salute law unconstitutional. Justice Robert H. Jackson's words below, as well as in Section 1, are from the Court's powerful opinion in that case.

PRIMARY SOURCE

To believe that patriotism will not flourish if patriotic ceremonies are voluntary and spontaneous, instead of a compulsory [forced] routine, is to make an unflattering estimate of the appeal of our institutions to free minds.

Freedom of Speech and Press

Guiding Question

What are the limits on the guarantees of free speech and free press? Use a table like the one below to take notes on how freedom of expression is limited in the various types of speech and media.

Type of Expression	Limitation
Seditious speech

Political Dictionary

- libel
- slander
- sedition
- seditious speech
- prior restraint
- injunction
- shield law
- symbolic speech
- picketing

Objectives

1. Explain the importance of the two basic purposes served by the guarantees of free expression.
2. Summarize how the Supreme Court has limited seditious speech and obscenity.
3. Examine the issues of prior restraint and press confidentiality, and describe the limits the Court has placed on the media.
4. Define symbolic and commercial speech; describe the limits of their exercise.

Image Above: Network television news anchor Katie Couric

Think about this children's verse: "Sticks and stones may break my bones, but names will never hurt me." This rhyme says, in effect, that acts and words are separate things, and that acts can harm but words cannot.

Is that really true? Certainly not. You know that words can and do have consequences, sometimes powerful consequences. Words, spoken or written, can make you happy, sad, bored, informed, or entertained. They can also expose you to danger, deny you a job, or lead to other serious events.

Free Expression

The guarantees of free speech and press in the 1st and 14th amendments serve two fundamentally important purposes: (1) to guarantee to each person a right of free expression, in the spoken and the written word, and by all other means of communication; and (2) to guarantee to all persons a wide-ranging discussion of public affairs. That is, the 1st and 14th amendments give people the right to have their say and the right to hear what others have to say.

The American system of government depends on the ability of the people to make sound, reasoned judgments on matters of public concern. People can best make such judgments when they know all the facts and can hear all the available interpretations of those facts.

Keep two other points in mind: First, the guarantees of free speech and press are intended to protect the expression of unpopular views. The opinions of the majority need little or no constitutional protection. These guarantees ensure, as Justice Holmes put it, "freedom for the thought that we hate," (dissenting opinion, Schwimmer v. United States, 1929). Second, some forms of expression are not protected by the Constitution. No person has an unbridled right of free speech or free press. Reasonable restrictions can be placed on those rights. Think about Justice Holmes's comment about restricting the right to falsely shout "Fire!" in a crowded theater. Or consider this restriction: No person has the right to libel or slander another. Libel is the false and malicious use of printed words; slander is the false and malicious use of spoken words.⁵

⁵ Both libel and slander involve the use of words maliciously—with vicious purpose; to injure a person's character or reputation; or to expose that person to public contempt, ridicule, or hatred.

GUIDING QUESTION

What are the limits on the guarantees of free speech and free press?

Type of Expression	Limitation
Seditious speech	crime if words trigger clear and present danger of criminal acts or advocate government overthrow
Obscenity	may not disseminate materials average person would judge as appealing to prurient interest; depicts sexual conduct dealt with in anti-obscenity law; and lacks literary, artistic, political, scientific value
Media	prior restraint only in war, obscenity, or incitement to violence; reporters must testify unless protected by shield law
Movies	rating system
Radio, TV	licensing; no indecent language
Internet	public libraries must filter access to pornographic sites
Symbolic speech	illegal or violent picketing; dissent that government has constitutional power to restrict, restriction is reasonable, and intent is not to squelch dissent
Commercial speech	advertising may not be false or misleading or advertise illegal goods

- identify the limits and protections of freedom of the press by researching media cases.

SKILLS DEVELOPMENT

GIVE A MULTIMEDIA PRESENTATION

Before students dramatize freedom of press cases in this lesson, you may want to review tips on giving a multimedia presentation in the Skills Handbook, p. S21.

Focus on the Basics

FACTS: • The 1st and 14th Amendment guarantees of free speech and press protect a person's right to speak freely and to hear what others have to say. • The Supreme Court has limited seditious speech and obscenity but seldom allows prior restraint. • Radio and television are subject to more regulation because they use public airwaves. • Symbolic speech and commercial speech are protected by the Constitution but can be limited under certain circumstances.

CONCEPTS: individual rights and responsibilities, limited government

ENDURING UNDERSTANDINGS: • The guarantees of free speech and press are intended to protect the expression of unpopular views. • The government cannot place prior restraint on spoken or written words.

Similarly, the law prohibits the use of obscene words, the printing and distributing of obscene materials, and false advertising. It also condemns the use of words to prompt others to commit a crime—for example, to riot or to attempt to overthrow the government by force.

Seditious Speech

Sedition is the crime of attempting to overthrow the government by force or to disrupt its lawful activities by violent acts.⁶ Seditious speech is the advocating, or urging, of such conduct. It is not protected by the 1st Amendment.

The Alien and Sedition Acts Congress first acted to curb opposition to government in the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. Those acts gave the President the power to deport undesirable aliens and made “any false, scandalous, and malicious” criticism of the government a crime. The laws were meant to stifle the opponents of President John Adams.

The Alien and Sedition Acts were undoubtedly unconstitutional, but that point was never tested in the courts. Some 25 persons were arrested for violating them; of those, 10 were convicted. The Alien and Sedition Acts expired before Thomas Jefferson became President in 1801, and he soon pardoned those who had run afoul of them.

Seditious Acts in Wartime Congress passed another sedition law during World War I, as part of the Espionage Act of 1917. That law made it a crime to encourage disloyalty, interfere with the draft, obstruct recruiting, incite insubordination in the armed forces, or hinder the sale of government bonds. The act also made it a crime to “willfully utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language about the form of government of the United States.”

More than 1,000 persons were convicted for violating the Espionage Act. The constitutionality of the law was upheld several times, most importantly in Schenck v. United States, 1919. Charles Schenck, an officer of the Socialist Party, had been found guilty of obstructing the war effort. He had sent fiery leaflets to some 15,000 draftees, urging them to resist the call to military service.

The Supreme Court upheld Schenck’s conviction. The case is particularly noteworthy because the Court’s opinion, written by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, established the “clear and present danger” rule:

PRIMARY SOURCE

The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent.

—Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes

In short, the rule says that words can be outlawed. Those who utter them can be punished if there is an immediate danger that criminal acts will follow.

The Smith Act of 1940 Congress passed the Smith Act in 1940, just over a year before the United States entered World War II. That law is still on the books. It makes it a crime for anyone to advocate the violent overthrow of the government of the United States, to distribute any material that teaches or advises violent overthrow, or to knowingly belong to any group with such an aim.

The Court upheld the Smith Act in Dennis v. United States, 1951. There, 11 Communist Party leaders had been convicted of advocating the overthrow of the Federal Government. On appeal, the Communist leaders argued that the Smith Act violated the 1st Amendment's guarantees of freedom of speech and press. They also claimed that no actions of theirs constituted a clear and present danger to this country. The Court disagreed:

PRIMARY SOURCE

Certainly an attempt to overthrow the government by force, even though doomed from the outset because of inadequate numbers or power of the revolutionists, is a sufficient evil for Congress to prevent. . . .

—Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson

Later, however, the Supreme Court modified the Dennis ruling in several cases. In Yates v. United States, 1957, for example, the Court overturned the Smith Act convictions of several Communist Party leaders. It held that merely to urge someone to believe something, in contrast to urging that person to do something, cannot be made illegal. In Yates and other Smith Act cases, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the law, but interpreted its provisions so that enforcing the Smith Act became practically impossible.

Obscenity

Both federal and State laws have made the dissemination of obscene material—material that is objectionable or offensive—illegal, and the courts have generally agreed that obscenity is not protected by the 1st and 14th amendments. But what is the standard for obscenity? Lawmakers and judges have wrestled with that question for decades. Justice Potter Stewart once famously said that, although he could not define the term, “I know it when I see it.” Jacobellis v. Ohio, 1964.

A large part of the problem in defining obscenity is that moral standards vary from time to time, place to place, and person to person. Much of what appears on television today would, in fact, have been banned as obscenity only a few decades ago.

In 1872, Congress passed the first in a series of laws that prevent the mailing of obscene matter. The current postal law, upheld in Roth v. United States, 1957, excludes “obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy” material from the mail. The Court found the law a proper exercise of the postal power (Article I, Section 8, Clause 7) and so not prohibited by the 1st Amendment. Roth marked the Court's first attempt to define obscenity.

Today, the leading case is Miller v. California, 1973. There the Court laid down a three-part test to determine what material is obscene and what is not. A book, film, recording, or other piece of material is legally obscene if (1) “the average person applying contemporary [local] community standards” finds that the work, taken as a whole, “appeals to the prurient interest”—that is, tends to excite lust; (2) “the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way,” a form of sexual conduct specifically dealt with in an anti-obscenity law; and (3) “the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.”

In recent years, the Court has heard only a handful of cases involving questions of obscenity. As you will see shortly, those cases have all involved the Internet.

Prior Restraint

The Constitution allows government to punish some utterances after they are made—for example, in cases involving libel or slander, or obscenity. With almost no exceptions, however, government cannot curb ideas before they are expressed. That is, except in the most extreme situations, government cannot place

Background

SEDITIONOUS SPEECH The Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, the Sedition Act of 1918, and the Smith Act all led to heated debate on the constitutional limits of political dissent. Congress passed the Alien and Sedition Acts in 1798 at a time when Americans feared that war was about to break out between France and the United States. Most Federalists supported the act, arguing that criticism of government would endanger the nation's safety. Jeffersonians, who largely opposed the acts, believed they exceeded the powers given by the Constitution to the National Government. The Sedition Act of 1918 was passed during World War I, when there was small but vocal opposition to U.S. participation in the war. The Smith Act was passed soon after World War II began in Europe. Federal prosecutors first applied this law to members of the Socialist Workers Party and then to Communist Party members.

ANALYZE PRIOR RESTRAINT

Read aloud this quote from Thomas Jefferson:

“We have nothing to fear from the demoralizing reasonings of some, if others are left free to demonstrate their errors and especially when the law stands ready to punish the first criminal act produced by the false reasonings; these are safer corrections than the conscience of the judge.” (This quote also appears in the Document-Based Assessment at the end of Chapter 19.)

Then ask students to infer answers to the following questions: Does Jefferson believe in prior restraint of unpopular views or words that incite violence? (No; he says there is nothing to fear from “demoralizing reasonings.”) What two actions does Jefferson believe will counteract unpopular opinions? (others who are also free to voice their opinions, and laws that will punish criminal acts that arise from the speech) Do you agree with Jefferson’s quote? Why or why not? What if the “demoralizing reasoning” incites people to commit acts of terrorism? Should we wait for the first criminal act to occur, or should the speaker be censored? Explain.

L2 ELL Differentiate Before reading the passage, review the meaning of prior restraint by asking students to predict what it means based on the meaning of each word.

L2 LPR Differentiate Have students review the text material under “Prior Restraint” and point out the exceptions to prior restraint on publications. (such extreme situations as wartime or when a publication is obscene or incites its readers to acts of violence) What prior restraints has the Court approved? (cases regarding political literature on military bases, publications about the CIA, certain publications in prisons, and student speech) Do you think Jefferson would agree with these examples of prior restraint? Why or why not?

L4 Differentiate To have students realize the importance of no prior restraint in a democracy, ask them to research control of the press in Nazi Germany or the Soviet Union. Have them compare government censorship and propaganda with the ability of Americans to speak openly about government actions. Ask students to use this information to write a poem or rap comparing speech in a totalitarian versus democratic society.

Supreme Court at a Glance The ruling in the case made it illegal for public officials to stop the publication of outrageous or insulting information.

SUPREME COURT at a glance

- ▶ Case: Near v. Minnesota, 1931
- ▶ Constitutional Principle: Limited Government
- ▶ Decision: Local public officials relied on a State law to prevent a newspaper from printing scandalous information about them. The Supreme Court struck down the State law. The Court ruled that freedom of press does not allow prior restraint on publications.

Above are headlines from the Saturday Press, the newspaper at issue in Near v. Minnesota. What is the significance of the ruling in this case?

any prior restraint on written or spoken expression.

The concept of prior restraint is basic to the meaning of the 1st and 14th amendment protections of freedom of expression. Near v. Minnesota, 1931, is a leading case in point. There, the Supreme Court struck down a State law that allowed local public officials to prevent the publication of any “malicious, scandalous, and defamatory” periodical. Acting under that law, a local court had issued an order forbidding the publication of the Saturday Press. That Minneapolis newspaper had published a series of articles charging public corruption and attacking local officials as “grafters” and “Jewish gangsters.”

The Court held that the guarantee of a free press does not allow a prior restraint on publication—except in such extreme situations as wartime, or when a publication is obscene or incites its readers to acts of violence. Even “miscreant purveyors of scandal” and anti-Semitism are entitled to constitutional protection, said the Court.

The Constitution does not forbid any and all forms of prior censorship, but “any prior restraint on expression comes to this Court with a ‘heavy presumption’ against its constitutional validity,” Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 1976.⁷ The Court has used that general rule several times—for example, in the famous Pentagon Papers Case, New York Times v. United States, 1971.

In that case, several newspapers had obtained copies of a set of classified documents, widely known as the Pentagon Papers. Officially titled History of U.S. Decision-Making Process on Viet Nam Policy, those documents had been stolen from the Defense Department and then leaked to the press.

The Nixon administration sought an injunction (a court order) to bar their publication, arguing that national security was at stake and the documents (government property) had been stolen. The newspaper argued the “public right to know,” and it insisted that the 1st Amendment protected its right to publish the papers. The Court found that the government had not shown that printing the documents would endanger the nation’s security. The government, in effect, had not overcome the “heavy presumption” against prior censorship.

The few prior restraints the Supreme Court has approved include:

- regulations prohibiting the distribution of political literature on military bases without the approval of military authorities, Greer v. Spock, 1976;
- a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) rule that agents must never publish anything about the agency without the CIA’s express permission, Snepp v. United States, 1980;
- a federal prison rule that allows officials to prevent an inmate from receiving publications considered “detrimental to the security, good order, or discipline” of the prison, Thornburgh v. Abbott, 1989.

⁷ There, a State judge had ordered the media not to report certain details of a murder trial. The Court found the judge’s gag order to be unconstitutional.

Supreme Court Notes

FIGHTING WORDS “Fighting words” are not protected by the 1st Amendment. In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 1942, the Supreme Court held: “There are certain well defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or ‘fighting’ words—those which, by their very utterance, inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. . . . Resort to epithets or personal abuse is not in any proper sense communication of information or opinion safeguarded by the Constitution, and its punishment as a criminal act would raise no question under that instrument.”

The Court has also said that public school officials have a broad power to censor school newspapers, plays, and other “school-sponsored expressive activities.” It did so in a case from Missouri, Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 1988. There, the principal of a St. Louis high school had prohibited the publication of a series of articles written by student reporters for their school’s paper. Those articles explored the impact that various events, among them pregnancy and parents’ divorces, can have on teenagers. Three students sued, but they finally lost their case when the High Court held that school administrators can exercise “editorial control over the style and content of student speech in school-sponsored expressive activities so long as their actions are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns.”

The Media

The 1st Amendment stands as a monument to the central importance of the media in a free society. That raises this question: To what extent can the media—whether print, radio, television, or the Internet—be regulated by government?

Confidentiality Can news reporters be forced to testify before a grand jury in court or before a legislative committee? Can those government bodies require journalists to name their sources and reveal other confidential information? Many reporters and news organizations insist that they must have the right to refuse to testify in order to protect their sources. They argue that without this right they cannot assure confidentiality, and therefore many sources will not reveal important, sensitive information.

Both State and federal courts have generally rejected the news media argument. In recent years, several reporters have refused to obey court orders directing them to give information, and they have gone to jail, thus testifying to the importance of these issues.

In the leading case, Branzburg v. Hayes, 1972, the Supreme Court held that reporters, “like other citizens, [must] respond to relevant questions put to them in the course of a valid grand jury investigation or criminal trial.” If the media are to receive any special exemptions, said the Court, they must come from Congress and the State legislatures.

To date, Congress has not acted on the Court’s suggestion, but some 30 States have passed so-called shield laws. These laws give reporters some protection against having to disclose their sources or reveal other confidential information in legal proceedings in those States.

Motion Pictures The Supreme Court took its first look at motion pictures early in the history of the movie industry. In 1915, in Mutual Film Corporation v. Ohio, the Court upheld a State law that barred the showing of any film that was not of a “moral, educational, or amusing and harmless character.” The Court declared that “the exhibition of moving pictures is a business, pure and simple,” and “not . . . part of the press of the country.” With that decision, nearly every State and thousands of communities set up movie review (really movie censorship) programs.

The Court reversed itself in 1952, however. In Burstyn v. Wilson, a New York censorship case, it found that “liberty of expression by means of motion pictures is guaranteed by the 1st and 14th amendments.” Still, the Court has never held that the Constitution grants the film industry the same level of protection against prior restraint that it gives to newspapers. In fact, it has upheld a requirement that films be submitted to official censors so long as those censors are required to act reasonably and their decisions are subject to speedy court review, Freedman v. Maryland, 1965.

Very few of the once-common movie review boards still exist. Most people now rely on the film industry’s own rating system and on the comments of movie critics to guide their viewing choices.

Radio and Television Both radio and television broadcasting are subject to extensive federal regulation. Most of this regulation is based on the often-amended Federal Communications Act of 1934, which is administered by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). As the Supreme Court noted in

EXPLAIN RESTRICTIONS ON SCHOOL SPEECH

The Supreme Court and lower courts have ruled that student rights are limited by the “special characteristics of the school environment.” Ask: What might these “special characteristics” be? (atmosphere in the school; impact of students’ actions on normal school routine; effects of student speech on classroom instruction and other activities in the school building; impact of students’ actions on the rights of others) Explain that school officials must be able to show that student conduct or opinions have disrupted class work, led to disorder in the school, or restricted the rights of other students. CHAPTER 19 CORE WORKSHEET
SECTION 3 Freedom of Speech and Press 3

These cases deal with freedom of speech in schools. Read each case carefully, and then answer the questions.

Case A At a school assembly, a student made a nominating speech for another student. In his speech, the student used obscene and sexually explicit language. The school suspended the student for two days for using such language. The student claimed that his 1st Amendment rights had been violated.

Decision Bethel School District No. 403 v. Fraser, 1988. The Supreme Court ruled that the student’s language was offensive, and the punishment did not violate his 1st Amendment rights. The Court pointed out that the vulgar language the student used was not the same as the political protest speech the Court had protected in Tinker v. Des Moines. The language used by the student at the assembly was not in keeping with the “fundamental values of public school education.”

- How did the Court rule on the case?
- What limits did the decision put on the student’s right to freedom of speech?
- Do you agree or disagree with the decision in this case? Why?

Case B A middle school student drew a Confederate flag in his notebook. After school officials learned about the drawing, the student received a short suspension. The school district had a policy clearly stating: “Students shall not at school . . . have in their possession any written material . . . that is racially divisive or creates ill-will or hatred.” The policy prohibited “a depiction of the Confederate flag.”

Decision West v. Derby Unified School District No. 260, 2000. In a school where hate crimes were increasing, the Tenth Circuit Court ruled that school officials had reason to believe the student’s flag drawing could cause a major disruption at the school or interfere with the rights of others. The judges noted that outside of school, this form of political speech would be protected by the 1st Amendment.

- How did the Court rule on the case?
- What limits did this decision put on the student’s right to freedom of speech?
- Do you agree or disagree with the decision in this case? Why?

Constitutional Principles

JUDICIAL REVIEW Although the law protects most people against libel and slander, public officials are less protected. In New York Times v. Sullivan, 1964, the Supreme Court held that public officials cannot recover damages for published criticisms even if exaggerated or false, unless the criticism was made “with actual malice.” The Court ruled that debate on public issues is critical to democracy, and that lawsuits discourage future criticism of government officials. Later decisions extended that ruling to other public figures, such as actors and private individuals involved in newsworthy events. Actress Carol Burnett proved malice and won a libel case in 1983 against the National Enquirer. However, in Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 1988, the Court affirmed the right to make fun of public figures in political cartoons and satire, noting that both have played a key role in “public and political debate.”

RECOGNIZE LIMITS AND PROTECTIONS OF THE MEDIA

Ask students to raise their hands if they think the following statements are TRUE:

- Public officials are allowed to prevent the publication of malicious and defamatory periodicals. (false; Near v. Minnesota)
- Reporters are protected against having to reveal their sources during testimony. (false; Branzburg v. Hayes)
- Any radio station that allows a personal attack on a public figure must alert that person about the attack and allow him or her to respond to the attack at no charge. (true; Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC)
- No Internet site may knowingly transmit obscene or indecent speech or images to any person under age 18. (false; Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union)
- The government has the right to prevent publication of material that it asserts to be harmful to national security. (false; New York Times v. United States)
- Newspapers may advertise abortion services. (true; Bigelow v. Virginia)
- Newspapers may not print State liquor prices. (false; 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island)

Ask: Were you surprised by any of these rulings? With which rulings did you agree? Disagree? Why?

DRAMATIZE FREEDOM OF PRESS CASES

Organize students into five groups: three newspaper groups, one radio and television group, and one Internet group. Assign each group one of the first five Supreme Court cases listed above that pertains to its particular medium. Each group should research details of its case and the majority, concurring, and dissenting opinions of the Court. Then have each group present its information to the rest of the class in the form of its medium; for example, the three groups researching newspaper issues should present their cases in newspaper form. The radio group could present its information in an “on-air” news-cast. The Internet group could construct a bulletin board display of its home page and “link” pages that describe the aspects of its case.

Freedoms of Speech and PressRules of the Road

The 1st Amendment stands as a monument to the central importance of free speech and the media in a free society. Various forms of speech are regulated by government, however. Why are radio stations and network television subjected to wide-ranging federal regulation?

The Supreme Court has ruled that school administrators can exercise “editorial control over the style and content of student speech in school-sponsored expressive activities. . . .”

The Federal Communications Act, administered by the FCC, bans the use of indecent language on the radio and on network television, and may deny violators a renewal of their operating licenses.

The Children’s Internet Protection Act (CIPA) requires public libraries that receive federal money to use filters to block their computers’ access to pornographic sites on the Internet.

FCC v. Pacifi ca Foundation, 1978: “Of all forms of communication, broadcasting has the most limited 1st Amendment protection.”

The Court has several times upheld this wide-ranging federal regulation as a proper exercise of the commerce power. Unlike newspapers and other print media, radio and television use the public’s property—the public airwaves—to distribute their materials. They have no right to use the limited broadcast frequencies without the public’s permission in the form of a proper license, said the Court in National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 1943.

The Court has regularly rejected the argument that the 1st Amendment prohibits such regulations. Instead, it has said that regulation of this industry implements the constitutional guarantee. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 1969, the Court held that there is no “unabridgeable 1st Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish.” However, “this is not to say that the 1st Amendment is irrelevant to public broadcasting. . . . It is the right of the viewers and the listeners, not the right of the broadcasters. . . .”

The Federal Communications Act forbids prior censorship—and so the FCC cannot censor the content of programs before they are broadcast. However, the law does permit the FCC to ban the use of indecent language, and the Court has held that it can take violations of that ban into account when a station applies for the renewal of its operating license, FCC v. Pacifi ca Foundation, 1978.

In several recent decisions, the Supreme Court has given cable television somewhat broader 1st Amendment freedoms than those enjoyed by traditional network television. United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 2000, is fairly typical. There, the Court struck down an attempt by Congress to force many cable systems to limit sexually explicit channels to late night hours. The Court agreed that shielding children from such programming is a worthy goal; nevertheless, it found the 1996 law to be a violation of the 1st Amendment.

The Internet The Internet has generated only a handful of Supreme Court cases—and each of them has involved attempts by Congress to regulate access to pornographic matter on the World Wide Web. Congress first attempted to protect minors from that material in the Communications Decency Act of 1996. That law made it a crime to “knowingly” transmit any “obscene or indecent” speech or image that is “patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards” to any person under the age of 18.

The Court promptly declared that law unconstitutional in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 1997. A majority of the justices found that the words “indecent” and “patently offensive” were too vague and that the overall effect of that law was to deny to adults materials that are protected by the 1st Amendment. “Regardless of the strength of the government’s interest in protecting children,” said the Court, “the level of discourse reaching a mailbox cannot be limited to that which would be suitable for a sandbox.”

The Supreme Court did uphold an act of Congress dealing with pornography, the Internet, and public libraries in United States v. American Library Association, 2003. There, a majority could find no constitutional fault in the Children’s Internet Protection Act (CIPA) of 2002. That law provides that those public libraries that receive federal money—nearly all of them do—must use filters to block their computers’ access to pornographic sites on the Internet.

Symbolic Speech

Most people tend to also communicate ideas by their conduct, by the way they do a particular thing. Thus, a person can “say” something with a facial expression or a shrug of the shoulders, or by carrying a sign or wearing an armband. This expression by conduct is known as symbolic speech.

Clearly, not all conduct amounts to symbolic speech. If it did, murder or robbery or any other crime could be excused on grounds that the person who committed the act meant to say something by doing so.

Just as clearly, however, some conduct does express opinion. Take picketing in a labor dispute as an example. Picketing involves the patrolling of a business site by workers who are on strike. By their conduct, picketers attempt to inform the public of the controversy and to persuade others not to deal with the firm involved. Picketing is, then, a form of expression. If peaceful, it is protected by the 1st and 14th amendments.

The leading case on the point is Thornhill v. Alabama, 1940. There, the Court struck down a State law that made it a crime to loiter about or to picket a place of business in order to influence others not to trade or work there. Picketing that is “set in a background of violence,” however, can be prevented. Even peaceful picketing can be restricted if it is

Background

CAMPAIGN FINANCE AS “SPEECH” In Buckley v. Valeo, 1976, the Court found that campaign contributions are “a symbolic expression of support” for candidates, and therefore the making of those contributions is entitled to constitutional protection. Both federal and State laws regulate campaign contributions, but the fact that in politics “money is speech” greatly complicates the whole matter of campaign finance regulation.

L3 Differentiate Have students debate the following statement: “Violence on television and in movies is a threat to society and should be censored.” Both sides should research statistics and information supporting or opposing the statement. (If pressed for time, have each student write a paragraph as homework, agreeing or disagreeing with the statement, and explaining why.)

L2 Differentiate Have students work in groups to make a list of rules for speech on the Internet. The class might be divided into such topics as regulation of libel, seditious speech, and obscenity. Others might prepare rules about prior restraint and whether some Web sites should be completely censored. Then have students decide how these rules might be enforced.

L3 L4 Differentiate Have students complete the Chapter 19 Extend Worksheet (Unit 5 All-in-One, p. 96). They will use library resources or the Internet to research the school freedom of speech and press case Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 1988. In this case, the Supreme Court ruled that school officials may censor school-sponsored newspapers because they are part of the school curriculum rather than a forum for public expression. The case is often cited as precedent in other cases involving the 1st Amendment rights of students.

Assess and Remediate

L3 Have students identify what they believe are the three most important cases that have guaranteed freedom of speech to Americans. Ask them to work in pairs to identify the constitutional issue of each case and then summarize the Court’s rulings. When finished, students should explain why they gave these cases most-important status.

L4 Restate the chapter Essential Question: How can the judiciary balance individual rights with the common good? Do students believe that the Supreme Court rulings discussed in this section have done a fair job of balancing rights with the common good? Have students draw a sketch of “blind justice,” with one of her scales labeled “individual rights” and the other labeled “common good.” Students should list guarantees of speech and press in the appropriate scale.

conducted for an illegal purpose—for example, forcing someone to do something that is itself illegal.

Other Symbolic Speech Cases The Court has been sympathetic to the symbolic speech argument, but it has not given blanket 1st Amendment protection to that means of expression. Note these cases:

United States v. O’Brien, 1968, involved four young men who had burned their draft cards to protest the war in Vietnam. A court convicted them of violating a federal law that makes that act a crime. O’Brien appealed, arguing that the 1st Amendment protects “all modes of communication of ideas by conduct.” The Supreme Court disagreed, saying: “We cannot accept the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labeled ‘speech’ whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea.”

The Court also held that acts of dissent by conduct can be punished if: (1) the object of the protest is within the constitutional powers of the government; (2) whatever restriction is placed on expression is no greater than necessary in the circumstances; and (3) the government’s real interest in the matter is not to squelch dissent.

Using that three-part test, the Court has sometimes denied claims of symbolic speech. Thus, in Virginia v. Black, 2003, it upheld a State law that prohibits the burning of a cross as an act of intimidation, a threat that can make a person fear for his safety. The Court also made this point: Those who burn crosses at rallies or parades as acts of political expression (acts not aimed at a particular person) cannot be prosecuted under the law.

Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 1969, on the other hand, is one of several cases in which the Court has come down on the side of symbolic speech. In Tinker, several students who had worn black armbands to school to dramatize their opposition to the war in Vietnam had been suspended by the district.

The Court found that school officials had overstepped their authority and violated the students’ right to free expression. Said the Court: “It can hardly be argued that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate.”⁸

The Court recognized campaign donations as protected speech in Buckley v. Valeo, 1976. See Chapter 7 to learn more.

Flag Burning A sharply divided Court has twice held that burning the American flag as an act of political protest is expressive conduct protected by the 1st and 14th amendments. In Texas v. Johnson, 1989, a 5–4 majority ruled that State authorities had violated a protester’s rights by prosecuting him under a law that forbids the “desecration of a venerated object.” Johnson had set fire to an American flag during an anti-Reagan demonstration at the Republican National Convention in Dallas in 1984. Said the Court:

⁸ Do not read too much into this, for the Court noted that it “has repeatedly emphasized the need for affirming the comprehensive authority of the States and of school officials, consistent with fundamental constitutional safeguards, to prescribe and control conduct in the schools.” The fact that in Tinker the students’ conduct did not cause a substantial disruption of normal school activities was an important factor in the Court’s decision.

Background

COMMERCIAL SPEECH One of the Court’s first commercial speech cases had an interesting twist. In Wooley v. Maynard, 1977, the Court held that a State cannot force its citizens to act as “mobile billboards.” At least, a State cannot do so when the words used conflict with its citizens’ religious or moral beliefs. The Maynards, who were Jehovah’s Witnesses, objected to the New Hampshire State motto on their automobile license plates. The words Live Free or Die clashed with their belief in everlasting life, and so they covered those words with tape. For this, Maynard was arrested three times. On appeal, the Supreme Court sided with Maynard.

idea itself offensive. . . . We do not consecrate the flag by punishing its desecration, for in doing so we dilute the freedom that this cherished emblem represents.

—Justice William J. Brennan, Jr.

The Supreme Court's decision in Johnson set off a firestorm of criticism around the country and prompted Congress to pass the Flag Protection Act of 1989. It, too, was struck down by the Court, 5–4, in United States v. Eichman, 1990. The Court based its decision on the same grounds as those set out a year earlier in Johnson. Since Johnson and Eichman, Congress has rejected several attempts to propose a constitutional amendment to outlaw flag burning.

Commercial Speech

Commercial speech is speech for business purposes; the term refers most often to advertising. Until the mid-1970s, it was thought that the 1st and 14th amendments did not protect such speech. In Bigelow v. Virginia, 1975, however, the Court held unconstitutional a State law that prohibited the newspaper advertising of abortion services. The following year, in Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, it struck down another Virginia law forbidding the advertisement of prescription drug prices.

Not all commercial speech is protected, however. Government can and does prohibit false and misleading advertisements, and the advertising of illegal goods or services.

In fact, government can even forbid advertising that is neither false nor misleading. In 1970, Congress banned cigarette ads on radio and television. In 1986, it extended the ban to include chewing tobacco and snuff.

In most of its commercial speech cases, the Court has struck down arbitrary restrictions on advertising. In 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 1996, the Court voided a State law that prohibited ads in which liquor prices were listed. In Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Association v. United States, 1999, it struck down a federal law that prohibited casino advertising on radio or television.

More recently, the Court dealt with limits on smokeless tobacco and cigar advertising. Massachusetts had barred outdoor ads for these commodities within 1,000 feet of any school or playground. The Court held that the limit was a violation of the 1st and 14th amendments' guarantee of free speech, P. Lorillard Co. v. Reilly, 2001.

Participating in Public Debate

Dear Student,

Our State Department of Education has instituted new requirements for the current school year. Effective immediately, the school year will be lengthened from 180 days to 200 days, and each school day will be extended one additional hour. The DOE feels strongly that this decision is necessary in order to remain competitive in the global economy. Statistics show that schools in China and India are in session 225–250 days a year. Students in those countries are well on their way to outperforming American students.

Thank you for your cooperation,
George Carruthers, Principal

Your right to participate in public debate is central to the founding principles of our country. If you received a letter from your school like the one above, you would probably have strong feelings about it. One way to express your views is by participating in public debate. You might speak at a city council or town hall meeting, or address your local school board. Use these opportunities to voice your opinions by following these steps:

1. Choose an issue of concern to you, and then find out whom to contact. Your opinion counts most when you express it to those people who have some authority or influence in the matter. That could be city council members, a private lobbying group, a school board, or a media outlet.
2. Organize your arguments. Decide on the best way to get your ideas across. Create an outline or a list of talking points to organize your thoughts. Think of supporting details for each point, and then identify the most important points, which you will emphasize to influence your particular audience. You might want to make these points the first few lines of your speech. Most important, rehearse what you will say.

3. Present your ideas. Speak in a loud, clear voice when you present your ideas. Keep your speech lively and exciting, and be precise with the words you use. If you conduct yourself with civility and respect to win the hearts and minds of other citizens, you will persuade them to take up your cause.

Freedom of Assembly and Petition

Guiding Question*How has the Supreme Court ruled on assembly and petition cases?

Use a table like the one below to take notes on important Supreme Court cases involving freedom of assembly.

Case	Issue	Ruling

Political Dictionary

- assemble
- civil disobedience
- content neutral
- right of association

Objectives

1. Explain the Constitution's guarantees of assembly and petition.
2. Summarize how government can limit the time, place, and manner of assembly.
3. Compare and contrast the freedom-of-assembly issues that arise on public versus private property.
4. Explore how the Supreme Court has interpreted freedom of association.

Anoisy street demonstration by gay rights activists or neo-Nazis; a candlelight vigil by opponents of the death penalty; pro-life supporters picketing an abortion clinic; pro-choice supporters on the steps of the State capitol . . . these are all everyday examples of freedom of assembly and petition.

The Constitution's Guarantees

The 1st Amendment guarantees "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." The 14th Amendment's Due Process Clause also protects those rights of assembly and petition against actions by the States or their local governments, DeJonge v. Oregon, 1937.

The Constitution protects the right of the people to assemble—to gather with one another—to express their views. It protects their right to organize to influence public policy, whether in political parties, interest groups, or other organizations. It also protects the people's right to bring their views to the attention of public officials by such varied means as written petitions, letters, or advertisements; lobbying; and parades or marches.

Notice, however, that the 1st and 14th amendments protect the rights of peaceable assembly and petition. The Constitution does not give to anyone the right to incite others to violence, block a public street, close a school, or otherwise endanger life, property, or public safety.

Note this important point as well: A significant part of the history of this country can be told in terms of civil disobedience. That is to say that much of our history has been built out of incidents in which people have purposely violated the law—nonviolently, but nonetheless deliberately, as a means of expressing their opposition to some particular law or public policy.

Do the 1st and 14th amendment guarantees of freedom of assembly and petition include a right of civil disobedience? That thorny question cannot be answered absolutely or without qualification because of the very nature of civil disobedience: those acts are expressions of opinion on some public matter.

Still, courts have consistently held that, as a general rule, civil disobedience is not a constitutionally protected right. Those who choose to take part

Get StartedLESSON GOALS

Students will . . .

- distinguish the conflicting but essential nature of the right to assemble by participating in scenarios about freedom of assembly and petition conflicts.
- understand the restrictions on assembly and petition by identifying and applying time-place-manner regulations and content neutrality to assembly situations.

SKILLS DEVELOPMENTDRAW INFERENCES AND CONCLUSIONS

To teach the skill of drawing inferences and conclusions, have students read Draw Inferences and Conclusions in the Skills Handbook, p. S19. Then have them do the Bellringer activity.

Focus on the Basics

FACTS: • The 1st Amendment guarantees the right to assemble peacefully and to petition the government for a redress of grievances. • Government can reasonably regulate the time, place, and manner of assembly, but those regulations must be content neutral. • The Supreme Court distinguishes between the rights of citizens to assemble in public places and on private property. • The guarantees of assembly and petition include the right of association.

CONCEPTS: individual rights and responsibilities, democratic principles

ENDURING UNDERSTANDINGS: • The rights of peaceable assembly and petition, basic to democracy, protect the people's right to bring their views to the attention of public officials.

REVIEW BELLRINGER RESPONSES

Discuss students' answers to the Bellringer questions. (1. Demonstrations may disrupt daily routines and individual freedoms. 2. It may cause inconveniences, but limiting the right to assemble would be harmful to democracy.)

INTRODUCE THE TOPIC

Display Transparency 19H. Have students complete these statements:

- Freedom of assembly gives me the right to...
- Freedom of assembly does not give me the right to...

Responses should indicate that freedom of assembly gives people the right to come together in public places to express their opinions on issues and encourage others to join them. This right is limited by time-place-manner regulations, public safety concerns, and public versus private property restrictions. Ask: What are some examples of assembly? (demonstration or march, picketing, prayer vigil) What are the advantages of joining a group to protest a policy or express an opinion? (A group has more clout than an individual protester. A large group is also more likely to get media coverage.) in such activities are often aware of that fact, and they are usually willing to accept the consequences of their conduct.

How has the Supreme Court limited the time, place, and manner of assembly?

Time-Place-Manner Rules

Government can make and enforce reasonable rules covering the time, place, and manner of assemblies. Thus, in Grayned v. City of Rockford, 1972, the Court upheld a city ordinance that prohibits making a noise or any other diversion near a school if that action has a disruptive effect on school activities. It has also upheld a State law that forbids parades near a courthouse when they are intended to influence court proceedings, Cox v. Louisiana, 1965.

Rules for keeping the public peace must be more than just reasonable, however. They must also be precisely drawn and fairly administered. In Coates v. Cincinnati, 1971, the Court struck down a city ordinance that made it a crime for "three or more persons to assemble" on a sidewalk or street corner "and there conduct themselves in a manner annoying to persons passing by, or occupants of adjacent buildings." The Court found the wording of the ordinance much too vague and therefore unconstitutional.

Government's rules must be content neutral. That is, although government can regulate assemblies on the basis of time, place, and manner, it cannot regulate gatherings on the basis of what might be said there. Thus, in Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 1992, the Court threw out a Georgia county's ordinance that levied a fee of up to $1,000 for public demonstrations.

The law was contested by a white supremacist group seeking to protest the creation of a holiday to honor Martin Luther King, Jr. The Court found the ordinance not to be content neutral, particularly because county officials had unlimited power to set the exact fee to be paid by any group.

Public Property

Over the past several years, most of the Court's freedom of assembly cases have involved organized demonstrations. Demonstrations are, of course, assemblies.

Most demonstrations take place in public places—on streets and sidewalks, in parks or public buildings, and so on. This is the case because it is the public the demonstrators want to reach.

Demonstrations almost always involve some degree of conflict. Most often, they are held to protest something, and so there is an inherent clash of ideas. Many times there is also a conflict with the normal use of streets or other public facilities. It is hardly surprising, then, that the tension can sometimes rise to a serious level.

Given all this, the Supreme Court has often upheld laws that require advance notice and permits for demonstrations in public places. In an early leading case, Cox v. New Hampshire, 1941, it unanimously approved a State law that required a license to hold a parade or procession on a public street.

Right-to-demonstrate cases raise many difficult questions. How and to what extent can government regulate demonstrators? Does the Constitution require that police officers allow an unpopular group to continue to demonstrate even when its activities have excited others to violence? When, in the name of public peace and safety, can police order demonstrators to disband?

Gregory v. Chicago A leading and illustrative case is Gregory v. Chicago, 1969. While under police protection, comedian Dick Gregory and others marched while singing, chanting, and carrying placards, from city hall to the mayor's home some five miles away. Marching in the streets around the mayor's house, they demanded the firing of the city's school superintendent and an end to de facto segregation in the city's schools.

A crowd of several hundred people, including many residents of the all-white neighborhood, quickly gathered. Soon, the bystanders began throwing insults and threats, as well as rocks, eggs, and other objects. The police tried to keep order, but after about an hour, they decided that serious violence was about to break out. At that point, they ordered the demonstrators to leave the area. When Gregory and others failed to do so, the police arrested them and charged them with disorderly conduct.

Checkpoint Possible answers: if the assembly disrupts school or courthouse activities; permits must be obtained for public demonstrations

The right to peacefully demonstrate in public is constitutionally guaranteed. In some situations, however, preventing a protest from becoming violent can be used as an excuse to prevent speech. The line between crowd control and thought control can be very narrow.

Demonstrations on private property are not constitutionally guaranteed, yet many State constitutions encourage businesses to allow petition. In that event, there is no violation of the property owners' rights, PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins. Why has the Court ruled differently on public and private property demonstrations?

The convictions of the demonstrators were unanimously overturned by the Court. It noted that the marchers had exercised their constitutional rights of assembly and petition. The bystanders, not the demonstrators, had caused the disorder. As long as the demonstrators acted peacefully, they could not be punished for disorderly conduct.

Recent Cases Over recent years, many of the most controversial demonstrations have been those held by anti-abortion groups. For the most part, their efforts have been aimed at discouraging women from seeking the services of abortion clinics, and those efforts have generated many lawsuits.

There have been two particularly notable cases to date. In the first one, Madsen v. Women's Health Services, Inc., 1994, the Supreme Court upheld a Florida judge's order directing protesters not to block access to an abortion clinic. The judge's order had drawn a 36-foot buffer zone around the clinic. The High Court found that to be a reasonable limit on the demonstrators' activities.

The other major case is Hill v. Colorado, 2000. There, the Court upheld, 5–4, a State law that limits “sidewalk counseling” at clinics where abortions are performed. That statute creates an eight-foot buffer zone around anyone who wants to enter. No one may make an “unwanted approach” to talk, hand out a leaflet, or wave a sign.

The Court found that the Colorado law does not deal with the content of abortion protesters' speech. It is aimed, instead, at where, when, and how their message is delivered.

Private Property

What about demonstrations on private property—at shopping centers, for example? The Court has said that the rights of assembly and petition do not give people a right to trespass on private property, even to express political views.

IDENTIFY TIME-PLACE-MANNER RULES

Ask a volunteer to define what is meant by “time, place, and manner.” (reasonable government limits on when, where, and how an assembly may be conducted) Read aloud the situations below, and have students identify whether they follow a time-place-manner restriction or are unconstitutional.

- The mayor rejected a rally permit for the local chapter of the Ku Klux Klan. (unconstitutional)
- The State's highest court ruled that shopping malls are not public places where citizens can distribute political pamphlets as they please. (time-place-manner restriction)
- Various injunctions have barred youths identified by the authorities as gang members from sitting in parks. (unconstitutional)
- A permit to march against police brutality was denied by New York City, citing rush hour congestion. (time-place-manner restriction) Yet the entire area was closed to traffic to celebrate the World Series victory. (This knowledge makes the denial of the permit unconstitutional.)

COMPLETE CORE WORKSHEET

Organize students into these six groups:

- Group 1: Peace Up, plaintiff
- Group 2: Town, defendant
- Group 3: Parents Against Violent Video Games (PAVVG), plaintiff
- Group 4: Mall Owner, defendant
- Group 5: Three judges, Peace Up v. Town
- Group 6: Three judges, PAVVG v. Mall Owner

Distribute the Chapter 19 Section 4 Core Worksheet (Unit 5 All-in-One, p. 101). Each group will analyze a scenario in which the rights of assembly and petition must be weighed against the government's responsibility to protect the rights of the community or private property. Have Groups 1–4 study their scenarios and answer the questions. These will be used as briefs explaining the facts in the case, the constitutional issue, precedents that support their position, and counterarguments. Groups 5 and 6 should also study their scenarios and identify precedents for the judgments they will make after hearing the cases. Have Groups 1–4 choose “attorneys” to present their briefs to the Group 5 or Group 6 judges. Each attorney has five minutes to present arguments. The judges can interrupt to ask questions. After hearing the cases, Groups 5 and 6 will write opinions on their cases, explaining their reasons.

Answers

Caption Assembly and petition guarantees for public demonstrations do not give people a right to trespass on private property.

Background

RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION CASES In 1995, the Court ruled that a Boston veterans' group did not have to include gay marchers in its St. Patrick's Day parade. The justices ruled that being forced to do so would interfere with the group's social and religious purposes. Other Supreme Court decisions have made associations more inclusive. Court decisions in the 1980s opened many formerly all-male civic organizations, such as the Rotary Club and Jaycees, to women. In these cases, the Court ruled that admitting women would not prevent these groups from carrying out their educational, charitable, and community service goals. There is no absolute right of association, however. For example, Congress can forbid federal employees to do such things as engage in partisan election campaigns or hold a leadership position in a political party organization, Harris v. United States, 1954.

Assessment Answers

1. The Court applies time-place-manner restrictions to assembly and petition cases. It has upheld laws that require advance notice and permits for demonstrations. Government's rules must be content neutral. Demonstrators cannot be punished for disorder if they act peacefully. Protesters may not block access to abortion clinics or approach people entering. Demonstrators do not have the right to trespass on private property. Guarantees of freedom of assembly and petition include the right of association.

- the right of people to organize to influence public policy and to bring their views to the attention of public officials
- (a) the act of purposefully but nonviolently disobeying the law as a means of expressing an opinion on some particular law or public policy (b) No; it is not considered part of the right of assembly or petition.
- It stipulates the right to associate with others to promote political, economic, and social causes.
- (a) Assembling to promote causes is a

Privately owned shopping centers are not "places of public assembly." Thus, no one has a constitutional right to do such things as hand out political leaflets or ask people to sign petitions in those places.

These comments are based on the leading case here, Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner, 1972. However, since that case the Court has held this: A State supreme court may interpret the provisions of that State's constitution in such a way as to require the owners of shopping centers to allow the reasonable exercise of the right of petition on their private property.

Freedom of Association

The guarantees of freedom of assembly and petition include a right of association—to join with others to promote political, economic, and social causes. That right is not set out in so many words in the Constitution. However, in National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Alabama, 1958, the Supreme Court said, "it is beyond debate that freedom to engage in association for the advancement of beliefs and ideas is an inseparable aspect" of the Constitution's guarantees of free expression.

The case just cited is one of the early right-to-associate cases. There, a State law required the Alabama branch of the NAACP to disclose the names of all its members in that State. When the organization refused a court's order to do so, it was found in contempt of court and fined $100,000.

The Supreme Court overturned the contempt conviction. It said that it could find no legitimate reason why the State should have the NAACP's membership list.

A person cannot be fired from a job because of political associations—for example, membership in a political party, Brown v. Socialist Workers 74 Campaign Committee, 1982. And a person cannot be required to disclose his or her political associations to be licensed to practice law, Gibson v. Florida, 1966.

There is no absolute right of association, however. In Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 2000, the Supreme Court held that the Boy Scouts have a constitutional right to exclude gays from their organization. The Court noted that opposition to homosexuality is a part of the Boy Scout organizations' "expressive association"—that is, what they stand for.

The decision overturned a ruling by the New Jersey Supreme Court. That court had applied the State's anti-discrimination law against the Scouts. It ordered a New Jersey troop to readmit James Dale, an Eagle Scout, whom the troop had dismissed when it learned he was gay. The Court ruled that a State cannot force an organization to accept members when that action would contradict what the organization professes to believe.

STUDY TIPS

Cornell Notes The Cornell note-taking strategy involves several distinct and easy steps. First, students should divide their paper into 3 sections, with horizontal lines near the top and bottom of the page, and a vertical line running from the top horizontal line to the bottom horizontal line that divides the main body of the paper into a narrow and a wide column. Write "First Amendment Freedoms" and the date at the top of the paper. Next, use the "5Rs": record, reduce, recite, reflect, and review. Record: Have students use the wide column for taking notes as they read the chapter, using abbreviations and shorthand whenever possible. Reduce: Have students identify main ideas, key points, dates, people, and vocabulary in their notes and write them in the narrow column. They will use these to write a summary of the main points in the bottom section of the paper. Recite: Direct students to study their notes. Cover up the wide column and respond to the key points listed in the narrow column and the summary. Reflect: Are there any parts of their notes that students don't understand? Review: Suggest that students spend 10 minutes per week reviewing their notes.

Document-Based Assessment

Freedom of Speech and Assembly

U.S. citizens burn the American flag in protest, and the Ku Klux Klan parades along Main Street. Both these controversial actions are protected by the 1st Amendment. Some Americans believe such actions should not be protected. Since America's earliest days as a nation, public and judicial opinion has been divided over the extent of free speech and assembly, as shown in the documents below.

Document 1

We have nothing to fear from the demoralizing reasonings of some, if others are left free to demonstrate their errors and especially when the law stands ready to punish the first criminal act produced by the false reasonings; these are safer corrections than the conscience of the judge.

—Thomas Jefferson, July 3, 1801

Document 3

... [F]reedom of speech which is secured by the Constitution does not confer an absolute right to speak, without responsibility, whatever one may choose, ... a State in the exercise of its police power may punish those who abuse this freedom by ... tending to incite to crime, disturb the public peace, or endanger the foundations of organized government. ...

—Whitney v. California, 1927

[T]he constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action. ... [T]he mere abstract teaching ... of the moral propriety or even moral necessity for a resort to force and violence is not the same as preparing a group for violent action and steeling it to such action. ...

—Brandenburg v. Ohio, 1969
